

Remittances from Canada to Developing Countries Using World Bank Data

By Mark Blumberg (June, 2014)

Total Remittances from Canada are around $24 billion per year to all countries. Some of those countries include the United States, UK etc. We thought it might be helpful to have a list of developing countries instead of all countries. There is debate about the term developing countries and the appropriateness of the term as well as which countries would be categorized as such. Others may take the data and use different countries. We found it interesting that the total of Canadian remittances to developing countries was about $15.6 billion. To provide some perspective all international philanthropy by Canadian charities was less than CAN$3 billion. The international philanthropy is heavily subsidized by our tax system and frequently discussed.

Here is a list of developing countries that received the largest amount of remittances from Canada. In the middle column it is the amount of remittances received by the developing country by Canada. The column on the right reflects total remittances received by that developing country from all countries including Canada. All numbers in article are in US millions unless indicated otherwise. Some countries don't track remittances or there may not be information with respect to flows from Canada.
